Sheriff Doug Gillespie has been a member of the Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Department since 1980. During his tenure as an officer, he has worked in a variety of assignments such as Patrol, Field Training, SWAT, K-9, Special Events, and the Police Academy. Following 27 years of service, he was elected Sheriff in 2007. After serving two terms leading the department, he'll be stepping down from that position later this year. News in Review correspondents Joe Gillespie and Dayna Roselli had a chance to talk with Sheriff Gillespie this week. They begin by looking back on the recent incident in which two officers were shot and killed on a Sunday morning, while eating lunch.

Results of a one-day survey of 12 domestic violence programs across the state provided a look at how well they are able to meet the needs of victims. News in Review correspondent Tate South spoke with Sue Meuschke, executive Director of the Nevada Network Against Domestic Violence for a look at the results.

It is July, the beginning of monsoon season in Southern Nevada. To keep your family safe in times of sudden weather changes such as flash floods, remember: Do not drive or walk through water when you can't see the street or pavement. If you are caught in your vehicle during a flash flood, stay with the vehicle until help arrives. It's easier to find you in a car than in rushing water, where you could be quickly swept away or struck by debris. Know where the detention basins and washes are in your neighborhood and if it looks like rain, stay away from these areas. This could include walking, biking and hiking trails and other recreational areas.

As fun as it may seem to play in the water, it's not safe.

There are some changes are underway for a number of Las Vegas hotels. THE Hotel, next to Mandalay Bay is rebranding itself as the Delano. The former Las Vegas Hilton, which has been known for a couple of years as the LVH, has a new owner and a new name. And the former Imperial Palace, which was renamed The Quad in 2012 is getting yet another new name. News in Review correspondents Joe Gillespie and Dayna Roselli spoke with the director of UNLV's Center for Gaming Research, David Schwartz, to get details.

Las Vegas is known for having one of the most successful advertising campaigns centered on the slogan "What Happens Here Stays Here." This week, the Las Vegas Convention and Visitors Authority unveiled a new campaign that they hope will appeal to the business community. News in Review correspondents Joe Gillespie and Dayna Roselli find out more about it from LVCVA spokesperson Heidi Hayes.

Nevada schools are getting another year-long exemption from the tough requirements of the federal No Child Left Behind Act. State Superintendent Dale Erquiaga says that the waiver for the upcoming school year will allow Nevada to continue on the path of implementing standards-based teaching and performance assessments for students and educators. The George W. Bush-era No Child Left Behind Act would have required 100 percent of students to pass state tests in the 2013-2014 school year. State officials say few, if any Nevada schools could meet that expectation. News in Review correspondent Tate South spoke with the author of “Real Talk for Real Teachers” Rafe Esquith, who believes great teachers can turn things around.

The NCAA has reversed a decision that banned UNLV’s football program from a post-season appearance this year. The school had produced an Academic Progress Rate score of 925 over a four-year period, but a score of 930 was required to maintain bowl eligibility. Recent adjustments to the scores brought the UNLV grade back up to the minimum. News in Review correspondents Joe Gillespie, Dayna Roselli, and Mark Thomas spoke with UNLV Head Football Coach Bobby Hauck to find out more.
